WHAT IS FOLK ART?

Folk art is handmade work that reflects the stories, people, cultures and traditions of a particular region. The artistic skills are passed down through generations, often within families. Folk art can include pottery, wood carving, weaving, and more.

WHY ARE THERE SO MANY FOLK ART OBJECTS IN PMG?

Isaiah Zagar, the creator of Philadelphia's Magic Gardens (PMG) and his wife Julia first connected with folk artists in the 1960s when they worked in Peru as Peace Corps volunteers. Their love for folk art grew as they purchased works from around the world for the Eye’s Gallery, Julia’s store at 4th and South Streets.

The objects at PMG are often pieces that broke and could not be sold. Many are special collaborative commissions between Isaiah and the folk artist. If Isaiah admires the work of an artist he will leave drawings with them to interpret in their own style. These partnerships sometimes continue for years and result in hundreds of unique pieces that Isaiah installs at PMG.

The majority of the folk art at PMG is Mexican, since the Zagars fostered so many friendships there over the past five decades. However, there are also folk art pieces from many other countries they have visited. Works from India, Peru, Ecuador, Morocco, Indonesia, and Guatemala can all be found in the space.

THE TRADITION CONTINUES

In the 1990s Josefina Aguilar collaborated with Isaiah to interpret his 4-armed man figure (left). In 2017, the figure was stolen from PMG (center). PMG commissioned a new version in 2018 (right), which Josefina created from memory since she is now blind. It was installed in a different location at PMG that year.

PMG Executive Director Emily Smith with Teresa and Sera of the García Family

The PMG staff began taking trips to Mexico in 2016 to carry on the Zagars’ legacy of working with folk artists. It is PMG’s mission to continue supporting the work of these talented artists and to share their stories and traditions with the public. PMG’s preservation team works with Isaiah to add these new artworks to the installation as old ones deteriorate or break.
THE VÁSQUEZ CRUZ FAMILY

SANTA MARÍA ATZOMPA, OAXACA | Unpainted terracotta

The ceramics of Angelica Vásquez Cruz (born 1958) are widely collected and have drawn attention to the work of her parents, Delfina Cruz Díaz (born 1929) and Ernesto Vásquez Reyes (born 1923). Vásquez learned how to make objects like jars and pots from her parents and also studied with Teodora Blanco. She eventually developed her own style based on Mexican history and legends. Early in her career her father-in-law, Antonio García Reyes (father of Irma Blanco and husband of Angelina Reyes) took credit for her work and sold it as his own. She is now an advocate for the rights of women, and many of her works celebrate women.

SANTA MARÍA ATZOMPA, OAXACA | Unpainted terracotta

Irma Blanco (born 20th century) creates whimsical female figurines that often incorporate animals and other creatures. She uses a clay appliqué technique involving small decorations layered onto larger pieces. She learned this technique from her mother, celebrated sculptor Teodora Blanco (1928-1980). Irma worked with Isaiah to create the totems on top of the archways in the sculpture garden.

THE AGUILAR FAMILY

OCOTLÁN DE MORELOS, OAXACA | Painted terracotta

The Aguilars portray the daily life of rural Mexico in their painted red clay figurines. Laura Akistlata Díaz (1925-1969) and Jesús Aguilar Revilla (1919-1977) began the tradition, which they passed to their four daughters who have developed their own distinctive styles. The Zagars started working with Laura and Jesus’s daughter Josefina Aguilarr (born 1945) decades ago. Josefina is known for her playful depiction of everyday life. Since losing her sight, she now presides over the work of her children and grandchildren.

Painted terracotta

The work of her sister Concepción Agüilar (born 1956) has been added to PMG in recent years. Concepción’s family’s ceramics feature more imaginative content and a vibrant color palette.

THE VALENCIA FAMILY

SAN ANTONINO CASTILLO VELASCO, OAXACA | Painted terracotta

Luis Valencia (born 1957) and his son Jorge Luis Valencia García (born 1979) depict imaginative creatures and townspeople often engaged in dancing, drinking, and other fun pastimes. In this way, the work celebrates life and is often filled with a sense of humor similar to Isaiah’s own. Luis lived with the Zagars in Philadelphia on two separate occasions, during which he created many of the works seen at PMG.

SAN ANTONINO CASTILLO VELASCO, OAXACA | Unpainted terracotta

José García Antonio (born 1947) works with his wife Teresita Mendoza Reyna Sánchez (born 1961) and their children, José Jr. and Sara. The family is known for their terracotta animals, mermaids, and large human figures, which they create from clay. José continues to work despite being nearly blind.

DID YOU KNOW?

- Many villages in Mexico are known for a particular kind of craft. Several families or artisans in the same village (pueblo) often produce similar artwork using materials derived from local resources. For instance, the black clay pieces at PMG are made by different families but all come from the village of San Bartolo Coyotepec in Oaxaca.

THE GARCÍA FAMILY

MEXICO CITY | Papier-mâché

José García (born 1955) utilizes traditional Mexican icons and themes in his papier-mâché work, such as skeletons and alebrijes. Alebrijes are fantastical creatures originated in the 1930s by renowned artist Pedro Linares. Linare’s trained García, whose own work is now known across Mexico and the United States. García met the Zagars in 1997 and often collaborates with them to create sculptures of Isaiah or Julia.

TONALÁ, JALISCO | Glazed stoneware

Jorge Wilmot (1928-2012) brought Chinese high-fire ceramic techniques to his home country of Mexico in the 1960s. He founded the National Ceramic Museum of Mexico and also established a studio in Tonalá, where Isaiah spent time collaborating with him. When Wilmot retired, Isaiah used a grant to buy thousands of tiles remaining in the studio, which now can be found throughout PMG and other Zagar mosaics.

DID YOU KNOW?

- High-fire ceramics (stoneware) are much more durable than low-fire ceramic (terracotta). The stoneware tiles and ceramics at PMG are in much better condition than the terracotta pieces, which were not made to last.

Jorge Wilmot (1928-2012)

- Wilmot was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on February 28, 1928. He spent several years in Mexico during the 1950s and 1960s, where he founded the National Ceramic Museum of Mexico in 1967.

Isaiah or Julia

- Julia García Wilmot was born in Mexico and spent her early years in Philadelphia. She was known for her whimsical creations and playful depictions of everyday life. Her works often featured skeletons and other fantastical creatures.

Josephina Agüilar

- Josephina Agüilar (born 1945) is the daughter of Laura Akistlata Díaz and Jesús Aguilar Revilla. She is known for her playful and imaginative depictions of everyday life. She has continued the family’s tradition of creating terracotta figurines.

DID YOU KNOW?

- One of the most common works created by the families is skeleton (calacas), skulls (calaveras), and alebrijes. These fantastical creatures originated in the 1930s and are especially popular during the Day of the Dead (Día de Muertos.) The holiday celebrates friends and relatives who have passed on. This imagery and the holiday are featured prominently in the 2017 Disney/Pixar film Coco.
